Veterans' Motivations for Opposing the War

There were many reasons why veterans opposed the Iraq war. Some veterans felt that the war was unnecessary and that it would lead to more violence and instability in the Middle East. Others argued that the war was illegal and that it violated international law. Still others felt that the war was simply a mistake, and that it would not achieve its stated goals.

Military Families' Motivations for Opposing the War

Military families also had a number of reasons for opposing the Iraq war. Some military families worried about the safety of their loved ones who were serving in Iraq. Others were concerned about the long-term effects of the war on their families and communities. Still others felt that the war was a waste of money and that it diverted resources from more important priorities.
